Background Information Growing and producing produce from seeds has enjoyed increasing attention in recent years. For example, consumers are becoming more interested in eating produce that is grown by a method that lessens reliance on large-scale agricultural operations. In addition, consumers may be more interested in growing or maintaining produce, such as a vegetable, in an easy-to-use, non-transitory manner, especially considering that large fields of growing produce may be common in the United States. As a result, producers may be more interested in methods for growing and producing produce that can be made more user-friendly. Modern consumers are often interested in receiving a high yield from their produce, preferably without having to make large financial investments. In addition, consumers are typically more interested in knowing the source of the produce they consume, such as the identity of the farmer that grew the produce, what vegetables were grown and/or harvested, how the produce was grown, for example, through the use of herbicides, fungicides, and/or pesticides, for example, and how the produce was grown.Ultrasonographic identification and transcranial Doppler monitoring of cerebral vasospasm following aneurysmal subarachnoid hemorrhage. The authors report the application of transcranial Doppler ultrasonography in the identification of cerebral vasospasm. In a case report, the authors describe the use of high-frequency ultrasound in combination with transcranial Dopp
