A: This kind of behaviour is often caused by badly written batch files that, when run, don't correctly terminate. In this case it appears that the last line of the batch file is echo OFF which disables the offscreen printing (unless it's in an already-echoed off block). To check if you have this in a batch file, open it in a text editor. If the last line looks like that, open any VBScript or similar file that you know does work, and then compare the batch file and the VBScript file. If they're different, or if you see that behaviour in the VBScript file, run the batch file and see if you get the same behaviour. If you do, the problem is probably the last line.

Ischemia-reperfusion injury to the brain is a major cause of cell and tissue damage. Multiple non-specifically acting drugs have been developed to reduce the extent of post-ischemic brain damage, but so far the effects of these drugs in humans are still not clear. Recently, the possibility to quantify neuroprotective effects of neuroprotective drugs using peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMCs) has been shown. It has been postulated that changes in cell viability, mRNA levels and/or changes in intracellular free radicals can be associated with brain damage. Therefore, we tested the hypothesis that the well-established neuroprotective substances ginkgo biloba extract (EGb 761), magnesium or nimodipine would exhibit neuroprotective activity in PBMCs after stroke-like events in vitro. Interleukin-6 release was used as marker for activity of PBMCs. In fact, the tested compounds could not produce detectable changes in the interleukin-6 levels, which indicated that the tested compounds do not exhibit any measurable neuroprotective activity in human peripheral immune cells. One-step enzymatic synthesis of O-glycosylated oligosaccharides using the O-glycan hydrolase from Flavobacterium heparinum. The bacterium Flavobacterium heparinum contains a glycosyl hydrolase capable of degrading heparin with  $\alpha$ -O-glycosidic bond specificity. Here, we show for the first time that this enzyme shows also  $\alpha$ -O-glycosidic bond specificity toward an oligosaccharide substrate. An enzyme was produced from fermentation of the recombinant strain Escherichia coli and it was found to maintain its glycosidase activity against the major heparin disaccharide L-iduronic acid. Substrate specificity study using novel model substrates demonstrated that this enzyme has  $\alpha$ -O-glycosidic bond specificity, degrading the glycosidic linkages found in heparin but leaving the sulfate groups intact. Using this enzyme, one-step enzymatic synthesis of O-glycosyl
