The theft of millions of dollars worth of legitimate voter data from a crucial databases by Russian hackers has created an unprecedented threat to the integrity of the 2020 US presidential election — a threat the White House has its hands full trying to mitigate and, in some cases, completely prevent. A senior White House official told the Hill that President Donald Trump has been fully briefed on the extent of the hack and that officials have been working around the clock to help the states mitigate and even prevent it from happening, saying that the hack has been classified as a “direct threat to the integrity of the election.” “This is the most sustained and difficult hacking campaign we’ve ever experienced from a foreign entity,” an administration official told the Hill. “The theft of data is a problem, but our system is so resilient that this will be more a challenge for the states to implement and explain that to people than it will be for the actual hackers. But we are working around the clock to help the states mitigate this threat and, in some cases, completely prevent it.” The unnamed official also said that Trump himself has been briefed on the situation. “As with all crimes, the president is briefed on it and is very concerned about it, but there's a difference between a presidential candidate and president-elect," the official said. Furthermore, the official said that the situation has created a unique challenge for the president and his administration, as the Justice Department and FBI are currently involved in ongoing investigations into Russian involvement in the 2016 presidential election. "We have to understand that this is a national security risk, and we have to meet that head on," the official said. "This is something we could not have taken seriously a few years ago. This is the consequence of hostile foreign actors trying to interfere in our elections." The White House said Tuesday that the stolen voter data included partial names, dates of birth and partial addresses of voters — and that the data breach is "significantly more sophisticated" than an earlier cyberattack on an Arizona database. Officials said that voter information was accessed from a server run by an election-related Arizona company, VR Systems, which states used to verify online voter registrations. Spokespeople for VR Systems and for the Republican National Committee (RNC) said that the information accessed was from voter rolls from

2016, and that the data was not used to manipulate
