What's new in NUVAVULT:

the Honey by Natalie Huston Milo looks like a standard, if slightly large version of a computer mouse. It's a small, slightly elliptical, golden furry mouse. It is lying on a small bookshelf in the corner of my kitchen. It is also a key part in a story about my favourite thing in the entire world: baking. Just like Milo. Long ago, my parents were being really cool and letting me bake cookies. My lovely father would bring me out to the garage. He would open the doors, and I would stand on a stool with a glass of sweet tea (now my fondest memory of my father is of me in an apron and glasses, kitchen tools in hand, standing on a stool to make cookies). He would give me a carefully chosen list of ingredients, and we would bake deliciously while I listened to the radio and thought up theories on perfect cookie shapes. It was wonderful. No 'shaping' as such, just me and a basket full of flour and spices and butter and some various butterscotch chips and mayo. My father would bake a plump cookie while I fixed up the next batch, letting him enjoy his own creation while I let mine bake in my basket. (We were all the same height.) It wasn't just great fun, it was possibly the best thing I've ever done. Now and again, since I was a kid, I would find a sad leftover biscuit or a paracetamol in my mum's purse. This is actually quite devastating to children. Now these same biscuits lay on my trashcan most days. I'm so proud of my wonderful mother and her fabulous collection of snacks and housewares. I'm also so saddened by what she must be going through. A few days ago, I thought about my mom. I was cooking something like pecan pie, and my dad was helping me with the washing up. Being such a perfectionist, I had taken steps to make my pie look just like the picture that I secretly want to hold on to. It's the only thing a pie makes that I'd like to carry to my grave. I needed to feel like I made the pie just the way it was on the picture, and if I couldn't remember how I'd made it perfectly, I'd feel like I
