The aim of this method is to attain high quality, with minimal effort. "I write with my left hand because I can't use my right hand, so I keep my other hand on the mousepad." This method involves the following steps. Each of these steps will be explained below. 1. Pay attention to the previous experiments. Read the various methods that were used to obtain a particular result. If the methods are different, that means the laboratory must go through diverse paths to attain the same result. 2. Write the method. See whether the method has been used before, or if the method has been devised by you. If the lab did not invent the method, it should be noted that and described properly. This is how the credit should be assigned to the lab. 3. Make it clear to other researchers how to obtain the same result, as a resource. This is a time consuming process. When you have more time, try to look for published methods from researchers in your field. 4. Correct any significant flaws. You may have made a mistake, but you can correct it. Use the method, and run the experiment. 5. The final step is to try the method on another lab. This is how you assess your method.
