With all these notes in hand, you can understand the code example that follows. Take a look at the comments that comment out certain lines, and you will see what the code is trying to do. Note that all of this code has been commented out, except for what is relevant to the question at hand, in an effort to make it easier to read. (Sometimes you can just leave comments out, and the other person will be able to read the code easier.) There are three different classes of variables that are named in this example. First, we have the class for the TrueType font that is being provided by the operating system. We do this in the following code by using the OpenType version of the SelectObject function, which we store in g_pSelectObject. This is the most common case. Next, we have the class for the TrueType font that was given to the operating system by the application. This is the only case that we do in the example. Finally, we have the class for the TrueType font that is defined on the printer. This is the most unusual case. We use this class of variable by calling the SelectObject function by name. When the code encounters a TrueType font that does not fall into one of these three classes, then it returns an error. The reason for this is discussed in the notes for the code, and the notes should make it clear enough, but it can also be explained by simply taking a look at the code itself.

In the following code, first, we call the OpenFontEx function to retrieve the operating system's font. We store the results in the g_pOpenFont variable. Then we call the SelectObject function to retrieve the g_pOpenFont variable. We store the results of that call in the g_pSelectObject variable.
