MixPanel is based on an Adobe Flash infrastructure, similar to the Adobe Creative Cloud . It works with Adobe Acrobat and Adobe Realtime Web technology. Elements is built on an underpinnings that was built at the beginning of Photoshop. When we built Photoshop, we wanted a program that could be very specific with a few select areas of the image. You can access a channel to a particular image, and specify that you want pixel color values that are in that channel averaged out regardless of the rest of the image. ... When we talked about professional image-focused software, we weren't just talking about simplistic camera-focused or photo-type stuff. We were talking about how we would treat your photograph.

The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. The idea of running Photoshop as a web application is even harder. But by using various new web technologies and collaborating with web developers and browser makers to adapt the software, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. With this beta, you can experiment with Photoshop in a browser-based application and find out whether web development or side-packing is the challenge that's right for you. To be able to use Photoshop in the browser, it had first to be rewritten to use web standards. The first version to use HTML5, CSS, and JavaScript directly was version 5 of Photoshop. Sometimes this presented some problems to the previously native-looking Photoshop user interface, especially for people who had become accustomed to the characteristics of the old Photoshop. Because web technology is relatively new, most people are not familiar with all the new elements of it. Some users don't understand the new way of working, and the experience of dragging stuff on the screen and so forth can be confusing for those coming from the native version. In the old days, Photoshop was a thick, stand-alone application. For work, it was important to have a computer with a large hard disk that was dedicated to the program, and not in use by any other applications. And most users had large monitors to allow for large images. Because most people didn't use the program very often, a computer with large memory was not necessary. Thus, Photoshop became one of the examples where the idea of using software in a web environment was impractical. Much later it was easy to rent remote web access to a Photoshop from the Adobe website. Often this was a very convenient way of using Photoshop and it allowed Photoshop to become a tool primarily for professionals. Our ability to experiment with it became rare. However, with the introduction of the web standards revolution and their implementation in the browser, it became possible to use features of the Photoshop web application.
